The POOLE POOL

THE night, yellow in the wavering headlight beams, seemed to be rushing at the truck with ever-increasing speed. In the driver's seat, Kelly Poole jammed his big foot on the brake pedal with despairing futility. Sweat dotted his forehead. A curve appeared and worn tires screamed wildly as they fought their way around the asphalt.

"Kelly," Uncle Gamlin yelled wildly, clinging with both hands to the clanging, rattling cab. "Are you nuts, or sump'n? This ain't the way to take our one and only truck down Dead Man's Hill. Put on your brakes."

"I am putting 'em on," Kelly bawled back above the rising wail of wind through the cracked windshield. "I durn near pushed my foot through the floor and nothin' happens. The brakes are broke."

"Then stop this truck," Pockets yelped wildly, trying to climb over Uncle Gamlin's shivering knee. "Kelly Poole, you stop this truck right now and let me out. I ain't ridin' in no busted-down truck on this hill."

"Sit down," Kelly told his little brother. "If I could stop, we'd all get out. But I can't so we'll make the best of it."

The truck thundered and coughed and clattered through the night, its speed increasing on the down grade until the fenders shivered themselves into a clanging blurr. The three in the cab hung on, Uncle Gamlin and Pockets with their eyes tight shut.

Presently the road turned. The careening truck did not. There was a racketing series of bumps and bangs, a rending crash, a wheezy gasping groan, and then darkness and silence.

Miraculously unhurt, the three climbed from the wreckage. By fitful moonlight Kelly and Uncle Gamlin gazed sadly upon the tangle of tin and iron and general scraps that had once been their means of livelihood. "There goes our moving and hauling business," Kelly said sadly. "And just next week we were trading the old truck in as down payment on a brand new one."

"Now," Uncle Gamlin added, "we don't have any down payment or any truck." Suddenly he brightened. "But don't you worry, Kelly. Just leave everything to me. I know just the trick to make everything come out just fine."

They limped wearily home in the small hours of morning. When Kelly awoke, Uncle Gamlin had already dressed and vanished on some mysterious business. Throughout the remainder of the week there was no sign of him, no word, and Aunt Fanny began to be hysterically certain that her dear husband had met with foul play.

"There's probably foul play, all right," Kelly said gloomily, "but Uncle Gamlin's more likely managing it. Sometimes I am forced to the sad conclusion that he ain't exactly honest in all his dealings. Only—" he added hastily, "where money's involved, I mean."

It was a dreary Saturday morning when Kelly, seated glumly in their now useless moving office suddenly looked up at the slam of the door. Uncle Gamlin stood there grinning. His hat was cocked jauntily over one ear and he had, in general, the smug look of a man who has just sold the Brooklyn Bridge to some unsuspecting yokel.

"What have you been up to?" Kelly demanded, jumping up.

"Why, Kelly, what a way to greet a man whose shrewd brain has just saved the firm of Gamlin and Poole from bankruptcy." As he spoke he began to unload his bulging pockets, dumping wad after wad of bills on the desk.

"There you are, Kelly—cash enough for the down payment on a brand new truck, and a few dollars over for minor expenses. Minus, of course, a little I held out to cover time and expenses."

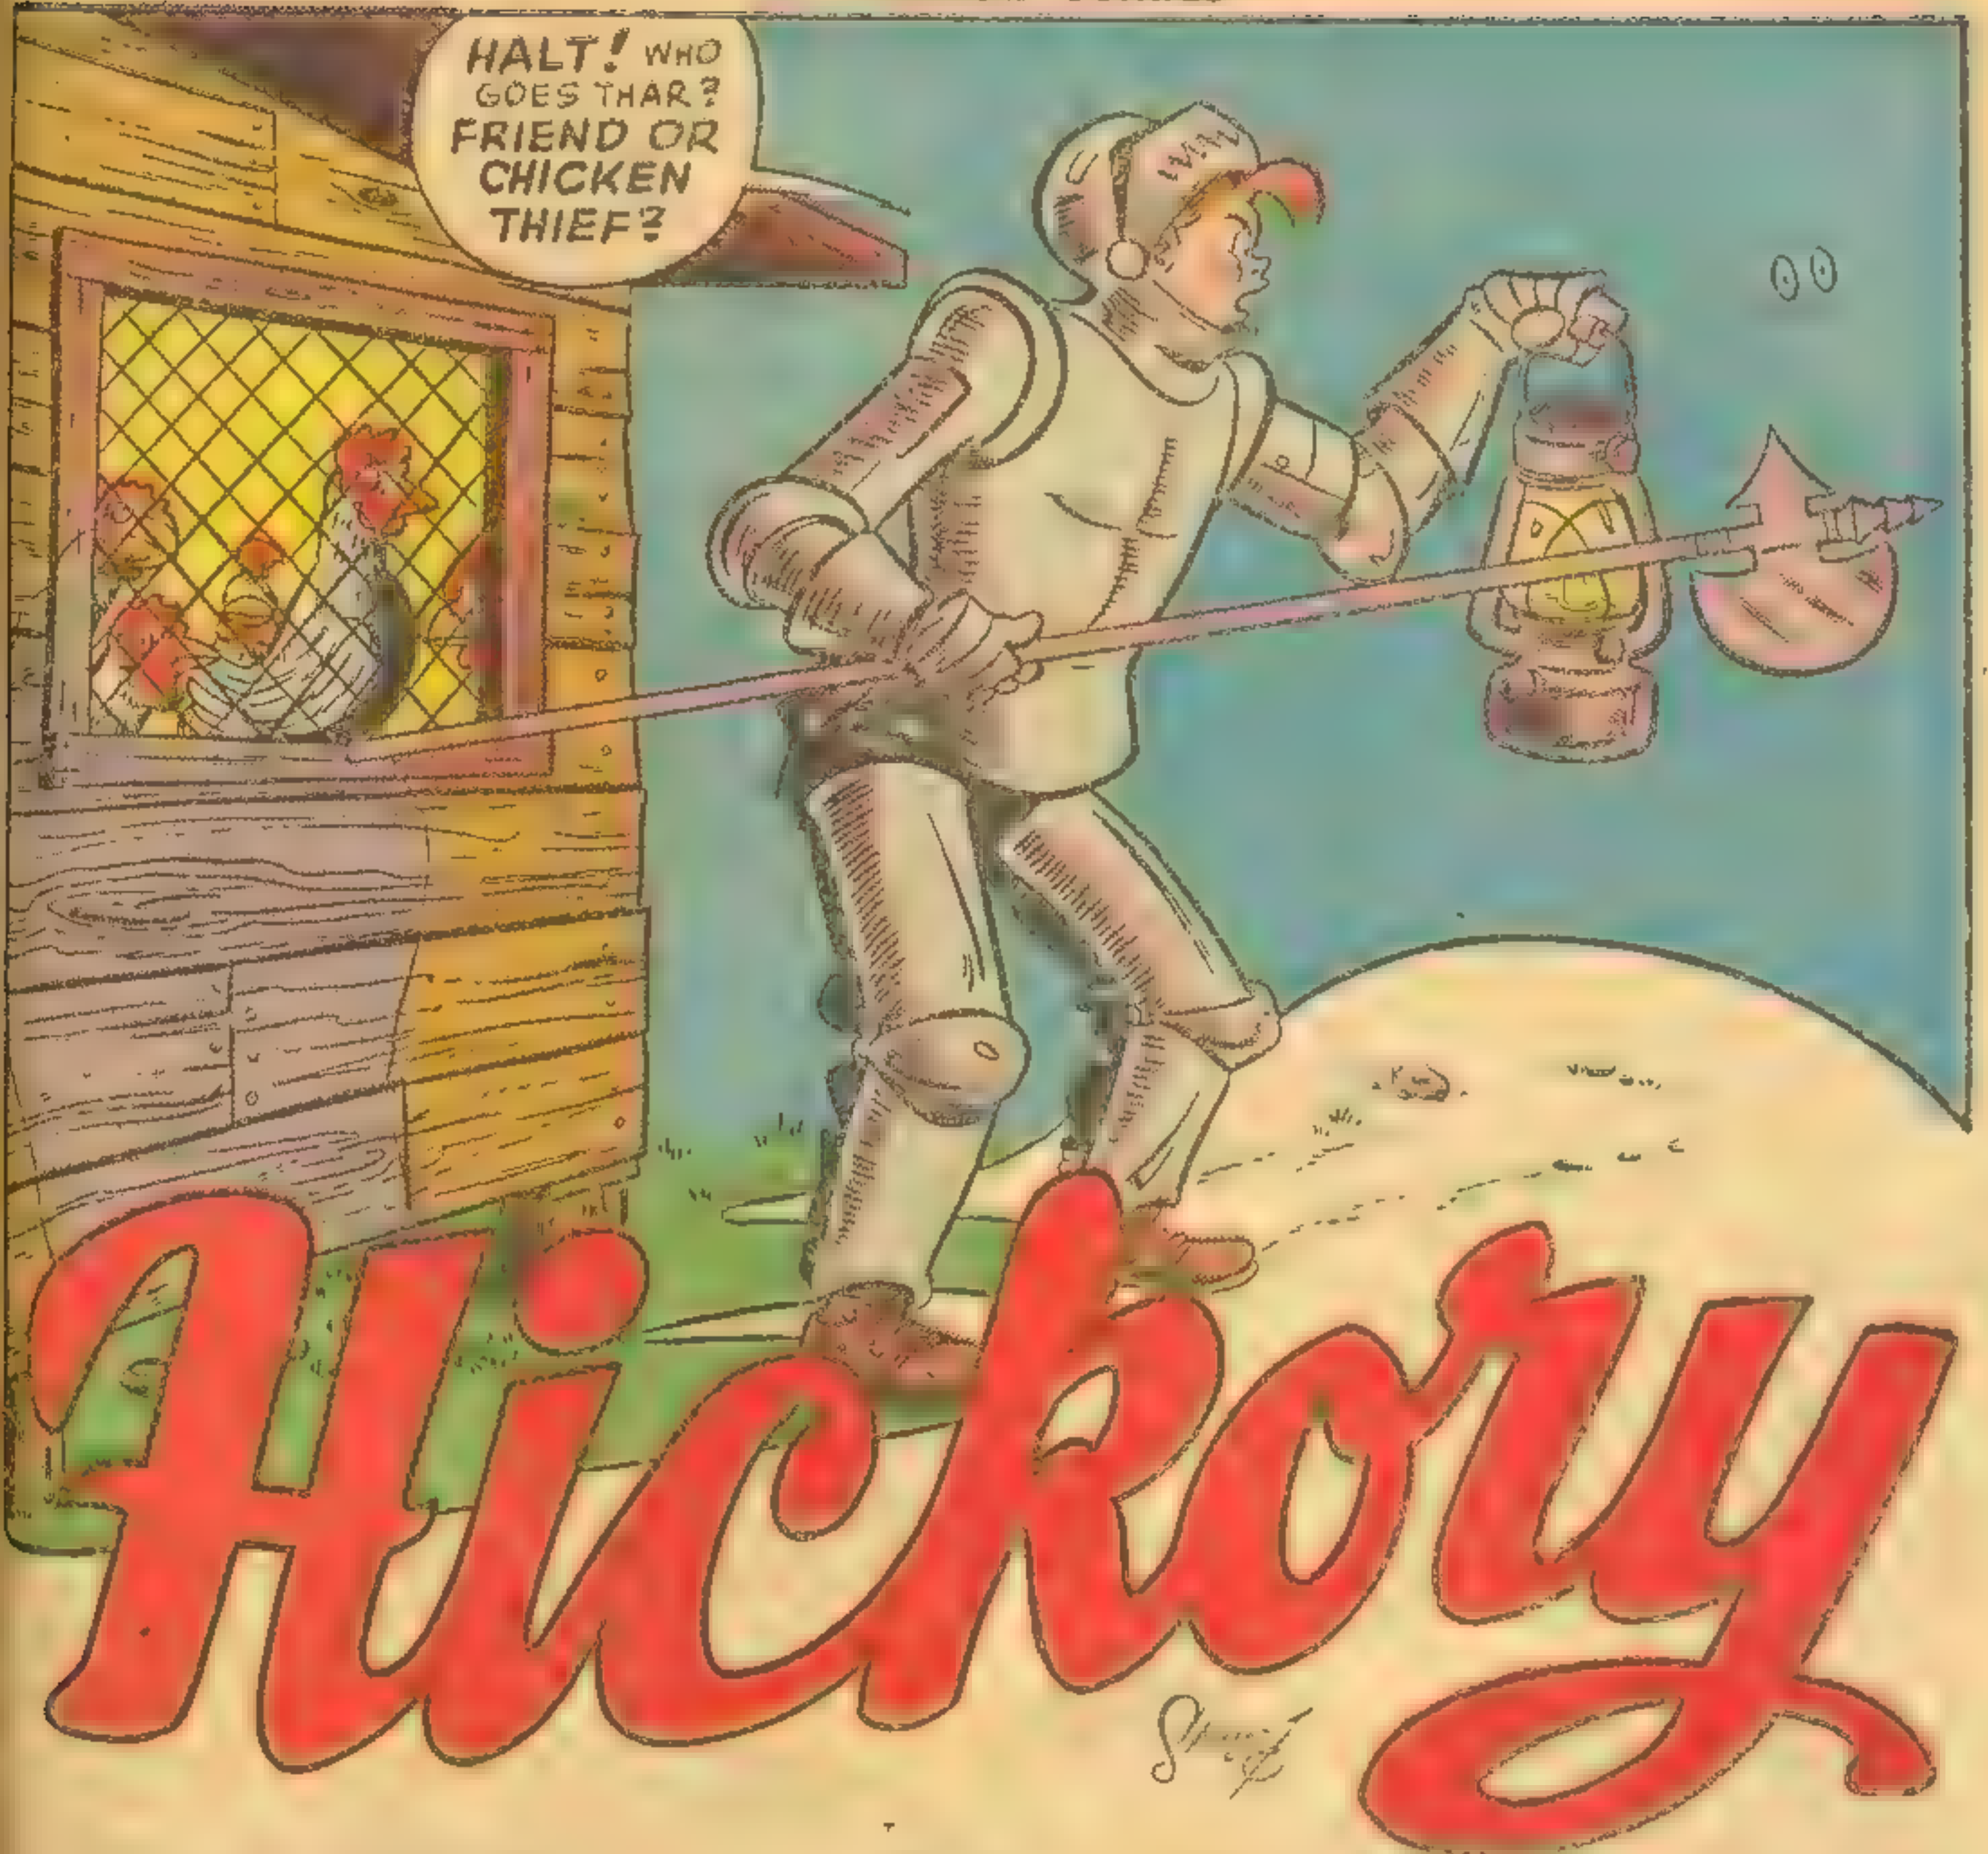

"Uncle Gamlin," Kelly choked. "Where did you get that money?"

"I ran a pool," Uncle Gamlin said cheerfully. "I went around to a thousand fellows and sold them a chance on our old truck for only one dollar. Then this morning I had a drawing and picked the winner. It was all fair and square. Strictly on the up-and-up, my boy."

"Our old truck?" Kelly gasped. "Are you crazy? Who would pay a dollar for chance on that wreck? It can't even be fixed."

"Oh, that!" Uncle Gamlin waved airily. "Nobody complained but the man who won it—and I gave him his dollar back."
